

Reflection

Throughout my work on the projects in this course I was able to engage with things that I had not previously exposed myself to. I was able to get a glimpse at what the possibilities are for me in my career, and the necessary workings behind those possibilities.

The first project, both the annotated bibliography and the investigative field essay focused on essay construction at the college level. Since the project was career oriented, I became more capable in not only finding articles and research papers related to my work, but being able to scan through them better for the truly important information. The trip to the library was a great experience that helped with this. Being more educated on this specifically I know will stick with me and benefit as I continue to write and be involved in sports media/analytics. Along with source gathering, it helped me write a proper essay at the college level which was also a valuable skill.

The rhetorical rationale was centered around different genres which introduced me into the multiple ways of approaching several different audiences. I tinkered around with website building, social media posting, and writing a cold professional letter to a sports organization. I enjoyed seeing and being able to experiment in these areas, and know that these are things I very well am likely to do again in the future for my career path. With these, I learned different rhetorical strategies that work to appeal to different audiences in different ways. Having a multitude of methods and practices at my disposal makes future work easier and grants me the ability to work with different genres and artifacts when exploring what I want to do.

This final project focused heavily on website building, which is a skill I have wanted to invest time in for a while personally. It gave me a good reason to try building one, and I was able to gain a solid understanding of building one using HTML and CSS. The presentation showing what makes a website good, and how users approach them was a good resource that helped me choose how I was going to format my site. The examples provided as well provided me with a valuable reference for making this site. With the skills gained from making my own mock portfolio website, I know absolutely I will be able to transfer them into other projects, both career and personal.

I found the primary projects very informative, each in their own way approaching different facets of things I found extremely valuable in what I plan to work in in my future. Making a website, efficiently researching and garnering sources, and utilizing several different rhetorical strategies among different genres all were amazing and valuable to me and the things I want to pursue in college and after college. I believe I gained a strong foundation in all of these subjects, and know that I will continue with this foundation and build off of it as I continue.
